Export Control for Operations

ITAR (International Traffic in Arms Regulations) controls the transfer of US origin Defense Articles, Technical Data and/or Defense Services. Controls affect both the export and the re-export or re-transfer of those controlled goods.

An export occurs when an ITAR controlled item is transferred to a Non-US citizen; no matter the form of transfer or the location.

Export controls need to be taken seriously as failure to comply could result in penalties, delays, loss of business or worse. There are severe potential impacts to companies and their employees for breaches of the export control laws and regulations.

Therefore it is imperative for management and staff of any company working in, or associated with, the Australian Defence Industry to understand the requirements and their obligations under ITAR legislation.

The "Export Control for Operations" course provides participants working at the Operations level with an understanding of the requirements and responsibilities of managing Export Control in the Australian Defence environment.

Course Overview

Export controls are not in place to impede trade but rather to ensure goods and technologies being exported from Australia are consistent with our strategic and security policy objectives.

Export controls provide a level of scrutiny of goods and technologies that allow the government to make a decision as to whether the export is in Australia's best interest.

The course identifies and discusses the Australian Export Controls, the United States requirements and explores the current best practice Export Control Management Systems (ECMS) that meets both sets of controls. Additionally, the course will assess existing ECMS to identify action plans and provide some experience with preparing export control forms.
